

Fact versus Fiction

Fish are to water, birds are to air and humans are to their interpretations, also known as our story. We are always interpreting what happens to us. When we don't separate fact from interpretation the two collapse on each other. In short, we think our interpretations are facts.

The quality of our interpretations determines the quality of our experience. There are three components that make up every experience.

